There is a container that gets initialized, each time its items' bounds are set. I want to change a container's items some time after they were added to the container. What is the way to do it? A: You can't do it from the container, you will have to modify the List data structure that holds the List of items. A: The easiest way to do it is to manually assign the items to the container. However, if you want to notify your container that data has been changed, you need to store the data somewhere. My ideas are: Store your data as a List, and store a reference to the List in the container. It's more flexible, and it works the way you expect it to. Of course, for you to update the list, you need to know that your container has changed. So, you need to store a reference to the container. Perhaps you could store the data as a Dictionary, where the container is the key. Make your container return a reference to itself. Then, if you need to update your container, change the key. Of course, this will require you 3e33713323
